Troopers accused of mocking investigated

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAMBRIDGE — Maryland State Police are investigating a mother's accusations that troopers laughed at her son and took videos after his boat fell off its trailer onto a road in Cambridge earlier this month.

Jane Bailey says her son, Christopher Bailey, recently faced a series of setbacks and was humiliated by the troopers' actions. He took his own life Sunday.

Police on Wednesday said the three troopers who responded to the scene May 18 did not post pictures or videos on social media. One trooper took photos in case a crash report had to be filed.

Police say a witness indicated troopers did not laugh at Christopher Bailey.

Jane Bailey says her son was also embarrassed by a photo that a towing company posted on Facebook ...

Give without being asked

SARAH DENO

While this column often tries to emphasize the importance of charitable work not only to help your community but your career as a young professional, this week I want to talk about the value of anonymity. I learned this important lesson from my mother. When I was growing up she would always pay twice as much for me to attend every school field trip. When I was old enough to ask her about it, she explained that sometimes there are children whose families cannot afford the cost of the field trip and she didn't want those children to be excluded. She never asked who it was used for, and didn't seem to have another child in mind, but she didn't want that child or family to have to ask someone else for help, she just wanted it to be available for them.

People who are well educated and accomplished can often struggle with financial insecurity to the extent that writing that $25 check for a field trip or even nominal expenses requested from co-workers could put them in an uncomfortable financial position. They face a complicated situation because most people assume that is not the case. They assume that people with certain jobs and levels of education are financially stable. This makes it harder for people in need to come forward and ask for help.

There is something profoundly important about anonymous help. It allows a person who is struggling to receive assistance without the burden of indebtedness. It also forces you to really think about what someone might need without them having to ask. It forces you to contemplate...
